In California and across the nation, income inequality and homelessness are growing, tax breaks for big corporations have expanded, middle class wages remain stagnant, the use of automation is rising, and climate change is accelerating. Workers understand the urgency of now and the power collective action both at the workplace and in the capital to address these growing concerns.

In 2018, working families used their voice and power to demand a say in the future of work and determining the future for workers. Working people stood together to defend their right to properly classified as employees, to declare "One Job Should Be Enough", to say "Me Too" and "Times Up" for sexual harassment and discrimination in the workplace, and to fight for equity and transparency over public funds.

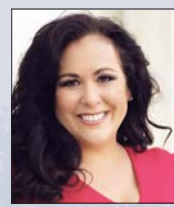

The California Labor Federation, with the support of over 1,200 unions and 2.1 million workers, pushed for an aggressive legislative agenda to not just defend against attacks from federal courts or the oval office but to advance progressive policies to make the lives of working families better.

Now, more than ever, we need elected officials who are committed to this fight and are willing to stand with working people. We salute our 100%ers and we urge all legislators to join us in the fight to advance justice for working people.

In Solidarity,

Art Pulaski
